FOREWORD

The public who have followed Mr. Hawthorne's work will be interested to know that since "The Trousseau" was bought for the Metropolitan Museum about two years ago, no less than five public institutions have added examples by him to their permanent collections. These include the Corcoran Gallery, Washington, The Art Institute of Chicago, The Peabody Institute, Baltimore, The Syracuse Museum of Fine Arts and The Albright Gallery, Buffalo; a list of which any artist might well be proud.

Mr. Hawthorne's many friends will be glad of this opportunity to see what he has been doing during the time that has elapsed since his last exhibition. His progress has been steady and sure, and although some of his recent canvases have already found their way into private and public collections, the little group included here is thoroughly typical of the kind of work he has been doing.
