DURING the season of 1911-12, an exhibition of pictures of the Grand Cañon was held in New York and continued through various cities of the Middle West. This exhibition was received with such wide interest (in one case as many as 54000 people saw the pictures) that it aroused a desire in the minds of a number of the painters in that group to continue such exhibitions, but of a wider and more varied character.

Western America, with its wealth of majestic scenery, is an almost untouched field; and that it has not been visited by many artists is an added reason for the existence of this society.

Thousands of people visit the American and Canadian Rockies, the coast, with all its variety, the Yosemite, the Yellowstone Park, and the splendid Grand Cañon; and there is a growing surprise that impressions of these beautiful parts of our country are not more often put on canvas.

We speak of American Art; there surely are American themes for American Art. It is the hope of the painters here represented that from this small beginning there may be other exhibitions which will make for a repeated and more extensive appeal.
