IN these days of art analysis it behooves all who venture into this field to have some password ready, some definition of their purposes.

With the medley of subjects that I have "tackled", my aims are not very easy to express. I claim only a zest for digging and probing amidst the vast and complex science of visual harmony, and an effort to register some of the thrills that old Nature gives us, in her many forms, quite aware that the results are merely tentative fragments.

If painters or other artists allowed their pride to rule them, few of their works would ever leave their studios, for in this field there is no such thing as completion. But the saner and simpler attitude, and one much more compatible with their need to live, is to carelessly and heartily fling out their wares for whatever sympathetic pleasure and interest the public may share in them, and profit also by the censure.
