FOREWORD

ALTHOUGH upon two occasions during the past year Orland Campbell has publicly shown single portraits, the group of paintings now on view constitute the first official exhibition of the artist's work.

Of one portrait here shown, Arts and Decoration for October 1922, says :

"This dignified portrait, just completed by Orland Campbell, places him among the foremost of the more lucid revoltés of this country. The canvas maintains the mood of revelry in an arrangement highly original and decorative. It is also in the finest style of the latter-day 'primitifs', whose work is distinguished by a profound simplicity."

Of another portrait here shown, Current Opinion for October 1922, says:

"Perhaps the most striking quality of Mr. Campbell's portraits is their absolute individuality..... Their style and treatment is unlike that of any other painter or school of painting, and there is no trace of the mannerist or conventionalist in them.

.....He has passed the tentative stage, and it is safe to predict that he may be counted upon for some brilliant achievements in the future."

Of another, Arts and Decoration, December 1922, says:

"A remarkable character study.....masterly in its decorative quality and a simplicity which suggests one of the Madonnas of the early Florentines."
