FOREWORD

“LOVE something and paint it”, said Ruskin, and for that reason the animal, endearing itself to man either by association or as the subject of his observation, has established its place in art, both of painting and sculpture.

As a character study in bronze or an accompaniment to landscape, the wonderful adaptability of animal life to the purposes of the artist has long been proven.

Following the organization of this society comes a further recognition through the founding of the Animal Painters and Sculptors' prize at the National Academy.

The rotary exhibition now on tour through the western museums has been received by both press and public with an unmistakable welcome.
